Sub menu behind other module

Posted by qpidity - 2010/11/15 12:05

Hi,

I've tried changing the z-index of the menu and other elements without success - the menu's sub items still sit behind the a module we have installed. The site can be seen here.

Grateful for any help.

Hello,

Use the following CSS rule:

#container_1,
#container_1 #user_1,
#container_1 #navlinks
  position: relative;

hi
sorry for my english i know it's not so good and thats why i probably have problem to fix my menu my sub menu items are hide too behind the other modules and i dont know where to exacly put the code you have wrote i paste it in css style box in module parameters but it doesnt work so if you could say how exacly use this code it will be great oh and here is page so you can check the problem

Hi,

Not sure what has changed but occasionally we are still getting the submenu items sitting behind the slideshow module in some browsers (this is after inserting the css as suggested above). You can see it here. Can you please advise ?

Thanks

I've just noticed it's happening in almost every browser. At first it works correctly but then after some time of being idle, the submenu sits below the slideshow module.

I have tried on my own to fix it, but I'm still clueless. I also have this problem. I use RocketTheme SolarSentinel template (http://expressokid.com)
I would like to also use the menu in the "feature" module spot.

This CSS stuff is going to be one of the nails in my coffin...

This issue does still persist. In all browsers after several minutes of the page remaining idle. I'm really not imagining it ! I attach one screenshot from Firefox...

Also, I've tried the same type of solution here but the submneu still ends up being positioned behind the modules below. Can you please advise how to resolve ?

Many thanks http://www.ari-soft.com/images/fbfiles/images/ARI_MENU_ISSUE.jpg

This problem with site template styles. Add the next CSS rules that fix it:

body div#top
 position: relative;
 overflow: visible;
 z-index: 2;
}

body div#wrap-middle
 position: relative;

The template is not purchased, and contains nothing complicated, all standard styles. I find it extraordinary that you are suggesting a template needs to be altered to conform to your extension rather than the extension conform to one's template.

Additionally you have not answered my original query - you did I presume see the screenshot where it is quite obvious that the submenu is STILL appearing underneath the modules further down the page. As mentioned before, this happens after the page is idle for some minutes.

I used to be happy with this extension but right now, I have to be honest.....this is not giving me a warm fuzzy feeling. I'd happily pay for a dropdown menu which is more manageable and doesn't require so much support.

We don't know have you technical background or not, but if you know CSS, you can see that top container of your site template contains "overflow: hidden" property. It means that all child elements which not in container region will be hidden. BTW, if two elements intersect it is usually require to specify different "z-index" CSS property for them that indicate priority of elements.
